

A. J. YOUNG

Mdccccxxiii

经经验经验经验经

By the same Writer

Boaz and Ruth and Other Poems The Death of Eli and Other Poems Thirty-one Poems

A. J. Young

London John G. Wilson 350 Oxford Street, W. 1 Mules

Two hundred Copies of this book were printed by The Cliftonville Press Co. Ltd. in November, 1923

Part One: Morning

The scene is outside Job's House.

SATAN enters.

SATAN

Someone was up betimes building this altar; These bright-cut faggots are undarked by dew;

Hot kiss of torch will set them leaping in flame.

Clearly Job intends an early sacrifice.

I have hit the moment:

I see the long gash of dawn in the sky;

The stars are melting like a hasty rime.

The whole earth awakes, trees, birds and insects;

And Job awakes-to what?

My sudden ear hears stirring in the house;

A thread of light burns from under the door. The matter now will come to a brief proof.

Does Job serve God for naught?

His meekness, loud in men's ears, what is it? Sly beggar's cloak seeking an alms of God. His charity—that lash of poor men's backs?

Arrow aimed at a far-sighted target,

Casting of careful bread upon the waters.

But hush! footsteps and drawing of a bolt;

Here till they end their sacrifice

This tree will shade me from encroaching eyes.

JOB AND SERVANTS enter from the house.

JOB.

O sight for angels! the sun's golden shears Clipping the fleecy vapour from the slow hills. Birds are loud awake already, Whistling like rapid milk that sings in pails. Bring leaves and straw; set to the torch.

The fire is kindled.

JOB.

Thou Who didst slay the Dragon, The deep sea-coiling Dragon, And bind that foolish Huntsman, The starry-sworded Orion, In yoke of fruitful stars, Glory to Thee, glory, glory.

SERVANTS.

Glory to God, glory, glory.

JOB.

O nightingales of Egypt, That falling out of Egypt Unload on our hills' springtime,

On flaming wharves of flowers, Your cargo of sweet song, Give to God glory, glory.

SERVANTS.

Glory to God, glory, glory.

JOB.

Leopards that leap from mountains, Like cataracts from the mountains, Dim wolves, night-faced hyenas And long small-headed serpents That suck the she-goat's milk, Give to God glory, glory.

SERVANTS.

Glory to God, glory, glory.

JOB.

And all ye wavy fishes, Both great and little fishes, That curtained by green water Do breathe strange pearl and amber Under the deep sea, Give to God glory, glory.

SERVANTS.

Glory to God, glory, glory.

The sacrifice is offered.

HYMN.

O Name unknown, O Word eternally unspoken, Revered and feared and loved and more than all adored,

From Whom the light of day as daily bread is broken, Dawn and set of sun as milk and wine are poured:

Thou art the Lord of life, the Life and the Life-giver, Breath of all living things that living live in Thee, Bright air and flowery earth, field and flashing river, Roundsun and crumbling moon and time-observing sea.

Giver of all gifts, we offer Thee thanksgiving, Across their glorious dust marking Thy fingertrace;

But most of all for man, great miracle of living, Whose frailer dust upholds a mirror to Thy face.

Servants go into the house.

JOB.

That man under the apple-tree?
A beggar if his cloak speaks truth.
Beggar? More like a wandering king,
One who still carries on his brow
The shadow of a fallen crown.
Closely he watched me; watches me closely still,
Silence the doubting threshold before he speaks.

JOB approaches Satan.

Stranger, your eyes are asking me a question; Would telling of my name give you an answer?

SATAN.

You, Job, I know, though unknown to you.

JOB.

Will you tell me whence you come?

SATAN.

I come from going to and fro in the earth And from walking up and down in it.

JOB.

Will you enter my house and rest?
Will you sit down with me and eat bread?

SATAN.

Neither I need:

I rest like the incessant waterfall
That sleeps in the steady thunder of its motion;
Your food too, is it likely to serve my taste?
My soul feeds on strong marrow from the bone.

JOB.

I find your prelude strange.

SATAN.

Think well if the event prove no stranger.

JOB.

Tell me at least what it is you seek,
And why seeking it you have come to my door.

SATAN.

Perhaps I come as much to give as to take; Getting and giving in some things are alike So that one gets in the measure one gives.

JOB.

Can I think then that you are a merchant From Saba, Arabia, Elam, or Egypt Come here to trade in gums, stones or blue pearls?

SATAN.

I trade in things not bought or sold in markets;

Thoughts are more to me than sea-mined pearls

Or any Arabian stones of kings

That can charm the trooping spirits of air; Men's tears are more to me than weeping balsam

And crushed hearts more than opobalsamum. But to narrow the matter now to a point: I observe here your altar;

I saw you offering a salted cake

And heard the song of your servants and maid-servants.

JOB.

And what question would you make?

SATAN.

I have travelled much;

The world has been to me as a single path. I have seen among men many strange customs: Some think of God as a very old man, Others think of Him as a warrior youth; Some worship Him even as a cow-horned goddess, Others again as the strange head of a cat. Now this diversity of men's opinion Has grown a burr that catches on my mind, Is there any steadfast truth as can be known Or is men's worship mere imagining.

JOB.

Are you a man that ask this of me a man? Have you no heart to give your heart an answer?

But none can speak for any but himself; One man may be to another as a foreign land Different of speech and thought and custom, As perhaps you are to me.

SATAN.

Did I not say so? Truth for men is variable as a star Continually changing colour to the eye,

A rosy fire, a sapphire or a tear;
And therein lies my doubt and question:
Men look on truth as their desire dictates,
Most filling their eyes with enchantment of moonlight,

Fearing to look at the snake-hatched cockatrice

That strikes with death.

JOB.

What man are you?

SATAN.

Like truth I am a star,
Not changing instantaneous robes of light
Like any common star of the multitude;
I am the solitary morning star,
The silver whisper of day's awakening;
The first bird that shakes off her faltering dreams
And wakens others with her song.

JOB.

Stranger, if I take your meaning,
I am such an one as needs awaking,
A head-hung bird that feeds her heart on dreams.

SATAN.

Dreams hang in your mind like bats in a cave.

JOB.

I do not doubt but all things are a dream Woven on the sleeping loom of creation; But intruding in men's dreams and causing them

Come broken fragments of truth like outside sounds

That agitate the dreams of sleeping men.

SATAN.

Would you be willing to wake now from sleep?

JOB.

I wait the gentle shake of death. How else?

SATAN.

By what I come to bring you and seek from you.

JOB.

The truth? your truth?

20

SATAN.

The truth that drives my blood as water a wheel;

That sends me out to pluck to flying pieces The rich fabric of dreams that from themselves Men continually spin like the Chinese worm.

JOB.

Do you not seek falsehood rather than truth?

SATAN.

By seeking the falsehood I find the truth. I prick all sky-reflecting bubbles
And let loose the empty nothing of air;
I overturn the old mossy stones of custom
Uncrushing for men's eyes their crawling life.

JOB.

Your words have heat of unknown argument; They are like smoking springs That rise out of dark sources in the earth.

SATAN.

True, my friend; you have hit a surprising truth.

I do not judge by the slender veils of sense, By thin appearance flashing on the eye; I sink deep wells of thought; The truth I drink is filtered through the mind; I cannot drink like placid oxen That muddy with their mouths the azure pool.

JOB.

A man can think too much,
More deeply than is good for life;
To such thought becomes a disease.
Thought springs out of its value as a use;
It cannot of itself judge what it serves.
Man lives by other things:
By the strong labour of his articulate hands,
By the glad earth and forgiving dawn
And the blossoming air that cages a thousand birds;

By love that knits the heart of man and man, Man's faith in faith and hope for hope And that believing that is God Himself.

SATAN.

You speak in broken sleep.
These things you speak of—faith, hope, believing—

Dream of a dream!
The echo of a man's unanswered prayers;
An unpromising rainbow painted on his tears;
A thin mirage cast on life's emptiness.

JOB.

You look on life with dark obliquity,
The shadow of some hate, I know not what,
Eclipsing for your eyes the light of truth.
You cannot find the life by slaying it;
Probing at the dead carcase of the truth
You miss the life, the breathing form, the beauty.

SATAN.

Beauty!
It is not beauty that I seek but truth,
And these two are adverse as water and fire.
Beauty is never truth; it is the mask
With which men cover up the face of life,
Hiding the twisted shadow of its sin
And the slow burning of its frozen tears.
What lovely tale was ever yet told
Of all those timeless ages whose dead leaves
Are overgreen on poets' brows
Since the wild sunset of the morning world:
What tale of kings or white-browed queens;

Of queens who changed their lovers with the moon,

Or kings who dangled empires on their knees But slipping once upon a little blood Sleep a long night among the slippered dead; Or what sad tale of lovers who had drunk Too deeply of each other's eyes to see As others saw who slew them both in hate; What tale in all the world, Tale that was true or was too true for truth, Was not the tale of sorrow or of sin? And all such tales under their beauty's mask Hide from the face of men the face of truth That is too terrible and full of death For living men to look upon and live.

JOB.

Stranger, your eyes are brighter than a bird's; And yet your face is sad as through you kept The kisses of dead things on your lips.

SATAN.

These words I have spoken, are they fire or wind?

JOB.

Not knowing you I know not what you say.

SATAN.

What do you mean?

JOB.

God's eyes reflect the truth, perfect and whole, Man's darkly and in part; what a man sees Is partly truth and partly too the man; Therefore I say that by not knowing you I do not know the truth of what you say.

SATAN.

When God made man He made a fool.

JOB.

But there are three men on their way here now, Eliphaz, Bildad, Zophar: they are my friends And wiser men than I—

SATAN.

Did you not bid me in your house?

JOB.

If talking of other things-

SATAN.

Then lead the way.

For I can tell of wonders: snowy mountains Mistaken for clouds among the clouds, Where no bird's foot ever sets delicate arrow; Deserts so full of a great emptiness That silence lies in them like sleeping thunder; Seas where men look on the black bones of

Seas where men look on the black bones of ships

Waving like wind-blown branches; cities too, Where honey-coloured men walking in gardens

Blow kisses to the sun—

Satan walking behind Job flings off his cloak and renders himself invisible.

JOB.

What was that light? You saw it, stranger, The sudden light that flashed before us? Why, what is this?

I see the house, the door, the steps, the trees; The stranger, has he gone? gone like a dream? If this should be a dream?

But no, I see his dark cloak lying there.

A mystery?—Well let him go; I am not sorry he went by my door.

Job goes into the house.

SATAN.

And so with the off-flinging of my cloak I leap into a density of light
Too shrill for mortal eyes. Pure flame again,
No weight of heavy blood withholds me now
To pass from here to earth's extremity
Moved by the simple impulse of my will.
But I have work to do with Job. So first,
As swiftly as a shooting star that lives
For a bright dying moment on the night
I rise to the angelic consistory,
Where God seated upon the heaped-up ages
That lie like drifts of everlasting snow
Still chides His angels charging them with folly

And ponders with the frown of mountainous brows

This ball of trembling dust men call the earth; And if I find my will at one with His, Then Job, ah Job!

For I going about to do my Master's will Shall come again close on the fall of night.

Part Two: Evening

The scene is as before.

SATAN enters.

SATAN.

He said that at my fall A tear fell from the great Father's face On heaven's burning pavement; such a tear Might compass the salvation of a world, And vet it scalds my heart. I am content; I could not be another than myself To abdicate the kingdom of my mind, No, though I were to die Breaking my heart on my unbroken will. Ah, I see a thing! A mystery, a shadow on the ground. It moves; I cannot shake it from my feet. Is it my SHADOW? But how can I, a spirit compact of light, Suffer eclipse and trail a mortal shade? Michael spoke truth: "Satan, thy throne is quenched," he said, "God's sons go sighing past it." So it was not for nothing the noon sun, Obstructed by the interloping moon, Grew visibly dark in mutilated light, And men who saw the shadowing hand of God

Stared at their own fear in their neighbours' faces.

But I, knowing the cause of things, cannot know fear;

And if I am forbid to pass this sun

That bathes with blossoming light earth's upturned face,

Here I remain,

Constant always to men as their own shadow, Spreading the swift contagion of my thought, Proclaiming in ways as various as the wind That adorable goodness sits not on heaven's throne.

That truth like a wild beast leaping from my lips

Shallwork such havoc in the slow flocks of men, That God at last shall confess failure, And tearing this written legend of creation Drop it piece by piece into forgetful silence.

First messenger enters.

SATAN.

Ah, a thief?

FIRST MESSENGER.

No, sir, a hind, one of Job's servants.

SATAN.

What news do you bring that brings you here?

FIRST MESSENGER.

The oxen were ploughing and the asses feeding And we were with them in the field; We looked for nothing, Till looking up we saw a cloud of dust. It blew towards us from the desert With the shaking thud of camels' feet; We saw bright spears in the sun And faces of black men with snowy teeth And ear-rings tinkling in the wind—

SATAN.

In brief, Your fellow-hinds were slain and you escaped And those Sabean warriors are richer By certain scores of oxen and she-asses And Job is so much poorer. Go now and tell this to your master.

First messenger goes into the house.

SATAN.

A man has nothing, neither goods nor children, But what he borrows from the lender, Fate;

He pays dear interest of daily care, He robs his sleep, his peace of mind to pay it,

Yet knows that any hour the hour may strike When he shall give all back, his best and dearest,

And in the end be left life's bankrupt.

Second messenger enters.

SECOND MESSENGER.

What man are you?

SATAN.

I am an astrologer.

SECOND MESSENGER.

What man is that?

SATAN.

One who can cast the stars.

SECOND MESSENGER.

Could you say something to my profit?

SATAN.

Two silver shekels chinking in my hand Sing like the nightingale. Find me here when it is dark. Come now, what news do you bring to Job?

SECOND MESSENGER.

It chanced I went across the hill for water Leaving the herdsmen with the sheep and camels

Locked in a narrow glen;

As I came back on the other side of the hill, I felt my face pricked by a sudden heat; I heard a nimble crackling of thorns and thistles:

Then at my feet a serpent-

SATAN.

Ah, caught in the trap Your fellow-herdsmen and their cattle Were no more to that blind-eyed fury of fire Than other snakes, mice, lizards, scorpions, That perished too. Go; enjoy the pleasure of telling evil tidings.

Second messenger goes into the house.

SATAN.

I have a fear for Job; the man is old And stands supported like the Indian tree By his own branches that have taken root; I fear the next axe hewing at the props May bring the old trunk with them.

Third messenger enters.

THIRD MESSENGER.

O God, the sight that I have seen!
I see it still:
The whirlwind from the desert,
The dancing pillars of dust,
The swaying house, the rent of bulging walls,
The twisted limbs, the flowers, the wine, the blood—
They are all dead, they are all dead.

Third messenger goes into the house.

SATAN.

Is it too much?

What if so great a gust should blow clean out The weak flame sheltered in that earthen lamp?

There is a pause. Then Job with a cry comes running from the house and falls at the altar.

SATAN.

He does not move. Can I have feared too well? O God, is it Thy spite to let this man Make easy passage into death by prayer?

Satan approaches Job.

Is there a heart that measures its slow time Within the flooded prison of those ribs And like a captive tramping in his cell Limps on across vast continents of pain? Is it the breathing body of a man That kneels there at that deaf indifferent altar, Giving and taking air to keep alive The working lungs and the incessant heart, Each speaking pulse and that self-seeing light That dwells between the eyeballs and the brain?

Or has death set his cobwebs on those eyes And with a shut-in gloom and gathering dust Darkened the inward pictures of the mind, So that what once was man is such no longer But something less than the night-loving moth

That shall survive him till the setting moon?

JOB.

Oh, oh!

SATAN.

He lives; that was a sigh that slipped his lips Like a thin bubble from a drowning man.

JOB.

O let me die and let this be the end; Let not the torture of a new day's light That wakens others waken me.

SATAN.

He rises, stretching hands in a blind prayer As though to embrace the empty form of God.

JOB.

Ask not that I should take this burden up; I cannot lift it; its bewildering weight Crushes me like a world.

SATAN.

He staggers like a tree that feels the axe Deep at its roots. Now with this man, this child,

This aged child that looks as old as God, Have I to wrestle.

JOB.

Friend, lend me your hand.

SATAN.

You know me?

JOB.

Ah, the stranger.

SATAN.

And your friend.

JOB.

I thank you if you are; my grief is great, My grief is more than I can bear.

SATAN.

Tell me, is this thing true I hear?

JOB.

I cannot speak it; what you hear is true.

SATAN.

Servants and cattle in one day destroyed?

JOB.

That too is true; I had forgot it.

SATAN.

Then learn, my friend, to find in what is left The greater blessing. You have your children still,

And therein lies your world.

For love though tender as a tear or dewdrop Can be as hard as diamond to resist
The world's worst hurt or envy.

JOB.

Oh!

SATAN.

Why do you cry?

JOB.

My sons and daughters!

SATAN.

What of them?

JOB.

I slay them all a second time to tell it.

SATAN.

Speak; am I not your friend?

JOB.

They feasted in their elder brother's house; A whirlwind, a great whirlwind from the desert, Smiting the corners of the house—And they are dead, dead, all dead.

SATAN.

Your children dead? your sons and daughters dead?

Slain by the hand of God?

And not one left to keep your name alive And save your blood from running to an end? O that is the last evil of all evil,

When the flame dies down on the household hearth

And the oil is spent in the cruse.

JOB.

Have pity on me, O my friend, have pity.

SATAN.

A man's footsteps are blind from birth to death:

As man is blindly born and blindly goes To death's strong-posted door, so all between

Is blindness; for O how blindly you have walked

To set your foot in this flower-smothered trap.

JOB.

A trap?

SATAN.

The fox, O Job, what of the trap-caught fox? The iron teeth are fixed; they bite like fire; It drags a blood-stained track across the hills, As you must drag—

JOB.

O God, have pity on me.

SATAN.

The sheep, the goat, the rat, the toad, the snake,

Tortured by imminent death, move man to pity, But man move God—?

JOB.

God's ways are dark.

SATAN.

The darkness is in man, in man himself; The bowed head and self-blinded eyes of prayer Make all the darkness.

JOB.

You are God's enemy.

SATAN.

And if I am, I am the more man's friend.

JOB.

God's enemy is not my friend.

SATAN.

Will you still pray to this child-slaying God? Did He not slay your children? Break them like playthings, fling them in the fire,

Beat them like singing locusts from the vines?

JOB.

And you, what would you have me do?

SATAN.

A man can act by his indwelling light, That whisper of the truth that makes him man, Not like the blind-eyed beast that sees a spot; Man has a more discerning gift To take life or refuse it as he will.

JOB.

What do you hint at?

SATAN.

A wise man who has drunk of life's top sweetness Will fling away the dregs.

JOB.

You hint at death?

SATAN.

Death is the sacrifice man pays for life, Requital of sin and seal of lasting peace.

JOB.

O if it might be, how sweetly would my body Mingle with death in his promiscuous bed And crumble back into slow earth.

SATAN.

Is it not one act? one swift sudden act?

JOB.

With self-destroying hand?

SATAN.

That way at least is open;
A man can make one safe escape from life
Cleaving a desperate passage through his heart
And winning death's invulnerable tower.

JOB.

To slay the body, is it to slay death?
No, death is God's gift;
Now should we snatch it, setting in one balance
His will and ours, a breath against a wind,
A stream choked by a rising sea?

SATAN.

What is it that you fear?

јов.

I fear to kill the God that dwells within.

I fear too with some reason;

For if man's soul can be so fugitive

That in his sleep which is death's breathing image

Strange forms of terror can intrude to lift him To fiery wrestlings in the heat of dreams,

To what strange lands beyond this hiding sun His spirit loosened from the blood-locked body

May by death's winds be blown
To face unknown and spectral forms of sin?

SATAN.

Is it then with such wild words as these—?

јов.

Not wilder at least than your spray-spattering words.

SATAN.

O were you less of man and more of woman!

JOB.

What do you mean?

SATAN.

A woman has too piercing sight to blind; Give her her children, she has God enough, But take her children and you take her God. In woman's heart the lioness and lamb Lie down together; lay hand on the lamb, The blood-hoarse lioness will start.

JOB.

You are a man one might have cause to fear.

SATAN.

O Job, were I as you,

In whom God's bloody knife has cut so deep, What prayers would I make that this same God,

Who sits now like a mountain on His throne, Might tumble down, a dead world on the world, And I

Like a wild prophetess under her tree Might sing to Him my sweet love-hymn of hate.

JOB.

Silence!

I will not hear you further; these words you speak

Have a more dreadful sound than the black wind

That brought the house down on my children's ruin.

Enough is said; more than enough is said. If you have come, if you have sought me out, As it appears, to tempt me from my God, You come too late.

SATAN.

Too late?

JOB.

Death is the price we pay at last for life. Is it too great a price? If I have purchased at the price of death The gift of those dear children that I loved, Richer before, I am no poorer now.

SATAN.

What gift is there to take where one has given?

JOB.

In what remains, the very pain of love, That teaches us the greatness of the gift, Not to be changed for any lesser joy. But, stranger,

This is no house to ask a guest to enter; There is one here that bids us be alone—

SATAN.

Are you a man?

JOB.

I am a man, Not less nor more; dust of the earth indeed, But a strange dust blown by the breath of God.

SATAN.

God!

What do you know, what can you know of God?

Is it from earth, green-gushing spring or autumn,

The stars or the cold cruelty of the sun, Or that white moon baring her milkless bosom, You draw this ineradicable dream?

JOB.

No, but from where close by the heart of God Man's heart can lie apart and listen and know. Friend, you have come too late; you should have come

Not now, but in my better happier days.

My love for God, my love for them, my children,

Was one; with one half gone, by so much more

I need the other.

Forgive me if I close the door.

Farewell.

Job goes into the house.

SATAN.

When God made man He made a fool. O God, bend down Thy star-reflecting eyes And single out this world among all worlds And see this Job, a man after Thy heart. For me it is enough.

O must it ever be that God and man Shall strive together and that Chance with both Shall strive, and there shall be no end? For one Shall lose, and that is neither God nor Chance, But man. Therefore I pity this man, Job; Pity all men indeed; though there is good, Mingled with greater evil in man's life, This may at least be said: man wakes too late, Sleeping through happiness, waking at evil, To see the happiness he missed; as now

From that black rose-tree the night-sheltered bird

Awakes too late and mourns to see the day Embalmed like a dead queen in barks and spice Breathe odours on the air, while silent night Nails down her coffin with a thousand stars.

Argument.

For three years there has been a drought in the land of Israel. Inquiring of the Lord, David learns it is on account of Saul's massacre of the Gibeonites. He asks the Gibeonites what atonement can be made, and they demand the death of seven of Saul's sons. Accordingly these seven men are sacrificed at Gibeon, and their bodies hung from a tree till the rain shall give the sign that atonement has been made. Rizpah, the mother of two of them, watches by the dead bodies throughout the summer, driving off the wild beasts and birds. The poem begins after the first rain has fallen.

The scene is the hill behind Gibeon. There is an altar-stone and attree from which hang the bodies of Saul's seven sons. Rizpah sits under the tree. The Chorus, women of her house, have come from Gibeah of Benjamin to take her home. It is night when they arrive, baving climbed the hill.

Choras enters.

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Which way, sisters, which way?

SEMI-CHORUS II.

No way is here.

SEMI-CHORUS I.

The track?

SEMI-CHORUS II.

Slipped like a snake from eye and foot.

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Stumble we all night on the hill?

SEMI-CHORUS II.

What hope, Unless the moon appearing shoot a shaft?

SEMI-CHORUS I.

A sign, a sign! See where she gores the clouds, The cow-horned one.

SEMI-CHORUS II.

O happy blossom of light!

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Sidonian women offer raisin cakes To twin-horned Ashtaroth.

SEMI-CHORUS II.

Good words, good words;
The Stone of God is here, the great Stone of God.

SEMI-CHORUS I.

The Stone anointed by the filial blood.

SEMI-CHORUS II.

What blood?

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Of Rizpah's two and Merab's five.

SEMI-CHORUS II.

The Stone has ears; silence is best for all.

SEMI-CHORUS I.

O God!

SEMI-CHORUS II.

Why do ye cry? what have ye seen?

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Lift up your eyes.

SEMI-CHORUS II.

To what, to what?

SEMI-CHORUS I.

The tree!

O heavy sight that breaks the moon.

SEMI-CHORUS II.

What tree?

SEMI-CHORUS I.

The tree whose roots are as earth-cleaving serpents

Striking to hell to bear upon its branches This sevenfold fruit of death.

SEMI-CHORUS II.

O that my hands Could pluck the fruit of this forbidden tree, A fruit too ripe, too ripe; but it is death By stoning or by sword—

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Look what is here; This is no stone, it is a crouching woman. Rizpah!

SEMI-CHORUS II.

Asleep?

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Too deep for voice to waken.

SEMI-CHORUS II.

O is she dead, the mother of dead children?

SEMI-CHORUS I.

What shall we do, what shall we women do?

SEMI-CHORUS II.

Sit we by her and mourn and mourn and mourn.

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Uncover not the sackcloth from her face; I fear to look on the dead woman's face, Sitting alone in the moon's bright danger.

CHORUS.

Was it for this we wove a crown
Of saffron and sweet-smelling dill
And led her through the clamorous town
With sound of flute and smoking torch,
The self-vowed victim, willing thrall,
A snow-white heifer of the hill,
And brought her to the rose-clad porch,
The shouts of men and the lighted house of Saul?

The smoke was blindness to our eyes, Our ears were deaf with the sounding flute,

The cries of men and the women's cries, Or we had slain her where she stood, Plucking from the deep-browed door The heavy lintel ere her foot Stept on the flowers that bright as blood Lay in a dazzling pool upon the floor.

RIZPAH.

O woe, woe!

CHORUS.

Someone speaks, who is it speaks?
A living voice? a death-tied tongue? I fear,
Greatly I fear, knowing not what to fear.

RIZPAH.

Go from me, ye that wake the dead.

CHORUS.

Rizpah!

Is it not Rizpah's voice? She lives, she lives; Her sleep was but the overwork of grief. And see, her face unclouding like the moon, As lost and dead and patient as the moon.

RIZPAH.

O is it ye, the women of my house?

CHORUS.

Thou seest us, thou knowest us.

RIZPAH.

Alas, Why have ye come? what do ye seek?

CHORUS.

O Rizpah,

Girding our robes in haste, we came this day From Gibeah.

RIZPAH

And why? what have ye heard?

CHORUS.

The rain crying with shrill voice from the ground.

RIZPAH.

The rain, the rain, what to me is the rain?

CHORUS.

Heaven shed sweet tears of pity in the rain.

RIZPAH.

My eyes were sooner kinder to my sorrow.

CHORUS.

Men shouted, hearing the reluctant rain.

RIZPAH.

They shouted, but I raise no joyful shout; For they have vines and olives, but for me The fruit hangs black and withered on the bough.

What hope is in the rain?

CHORUS.

Trusting the rain

Had washed from these dead bodies of thy sons

The shadow of the blood that cursed the earth, We came.

RIZPAH.

And have I not shed tears enough
To loose from earth the fastest-clinging curse?
And whence is this blood-shadow? Blood met
blood;

If so be that Saul wrought a deed of blood His house has given a piteous bloody answer.

CHORUS.

No question make we one way or another; It is the hate of Gibeon is strong.

RIZPAH.

The hate of Gibeon is beyond all hate; Savage destroyers of the dead, they shoot Across death's boundary a poisonous arrow At the unburied dead, pursuing hate To endless end.

CHORUS.

O was it for Gibeon, Who tricked him with the tale of mouldy bread, That Joshua bade the sun and moon stand still Over the Amorites in Ajalon And shut the five kings in a living tomb, Hanging their bodies after in the sun?

RIZPAH.

And I through a long summer, sun and moon, Keep watch by these dead bodies of my sons, Driving the obscene beasts and bitter birds.

CHORUS.

Evil, thrice-evil race of Gibeon!
And what of those two with pretence of wheat,
Who passed the sleeping portress at her mill
And slew at noon the young king on his bed,
Whose spear-borne head was laid in Abner's tomb?

RIZPAH.

But one I hate more than all Gibeon.

CHORUS.

Whom more than all Gibeon dost thou hate?

David.

CHORUS.

O lay thy hand upon thy mouth If thou wouldst speak of him, the Lord's anointed.

RIZPAH.

Anointed by what oil?

CHORUS.

From Samuel's horn.

RIZPAH.

No fragrant oil of myrrh and calamus Anointed Jesse's son.

CHORUS.

How so, how so?

RIZPAH.

Too bitter was the smell.

CHORUS.

Then say what oil.

RIZPAH.

The blood of Saul's seven sons.

CHORUS.

What dost thou hint?

RIZPAH.

He slew them at the mere excuse of rain, Not by his own hand but by Gibeon, That safer he might ride their father's throne.

CHORUS.

One son hesparedat least, young Mephibosheth

RIZPAH.

Lame on both legs! a lame man for a king!

CHORUS.

O Rizpah, not for strife of words we came.

RIZPAH.

Why have ye come?

CHORUS.

We came to take thee hence To eat thy bread once more among the living.

RIZPAH.

My tears are sweeter while I watch the dead.

CHORUS.

Thou wilt not come then?

RIZPAH.

Here beneath this tree
Mygriefhas taken root, and like the night shade
Brings forth its poisoned berries; day and night
I eat that fruit, living by my own pain.

CHORUS.

This rain has opened graves for thy dead sons.

RIZPAH.

When they go back to Gibeah, I go.

CHORUS.

Thou wilt not come?

RIZPAH.

Shall I forsake the dead? Their spirits haunt these leafy trees, by day Hanging like light-dazed bats, but at nightfall Flittering to and fro in the brown air, Crying for easeful burial.

CHORUS.

Is this the end?

RIZPAH.

It is the end? no further word I speak.

CHORUS.

They say that under this sacred Stone, Raised by the Zuzim and Zamzummim, Giant pest-peoples that lived of old, Crouches a maiden unnamed, unknown, Bending forward, chin upon knees, Locked together limb to limb, A victim buried alive to appease The Baal that gives increase to corn-field and sheep-fold.

Woe for the luckless lot of her, The girdled girl, unwooed, unwon, Lying alone in her straitened bed, With apples unplucked and no sweet myrrh

Scenting her skirts with borrowed breath;
But woe for the heavier lot of one,
A woman wed to incestuous death,
That labours in second pangs to bear the unborn dead.

SEMI-CHORUS I.

What are those dancing lights?

SEMI-CHORUS II.

They climb the hill.

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Wild beasts with eyes like wandering stars, Hyenas, wolves or jackals?

SEMI-CHORUS II.

Dawn is near; I hear the rapid noise of birds.

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Nay, lamps, That dart sharp questions at a doubtful way.

SEMI-CHORUS II.

Hither?

SEMI-CHORUS I.

So seems it, and I hear men's voices.

SEMI-CHORUS II.

What cause have we to fear?

SEMI-CHORUS I.

The event will show, And soon.

SEMI-CHORUS II.

One man I see who leads the rest; He beckons back his following and comes. O do I dream?

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Nay, it is he, the king.

King David enters with Attendants,

DAVID.

Who are ye women gathered at this tree? I scan your faces, but the face I seek, I see not. Are ye silent?

CHORUS.

O great king-

DAVID.

Say on.

CHORUS.

I am a reed, shaken by wind.

DAVID.

What dost thou fear?

CHORUS.

The swift gust of thy presence.

DAVID.

Fear no such fear. Come I with ill intent?

CHORUS.

How can I know?

DAVID.

Should I then come myself?
A king has in his servants a long arm
To do a needful evil. Fear not, but say,
Ye are her women surely, where is Rizpah.

CHORUS.

She looks at thee, O king.

DAVID.

That crouching stare
That seems about to spring? O never think
Thou hast a cockatrice's eye to kill;

I bear upon my breast a righteous gem Against enchantingeye. And art thou Rizpah, The watcher by this empty tomb of air, The mother who has nursed these seven dead men

Through the dark summer heat? Thou wilt not speak?

Why then on my side is no cause to speak. But I have charm for the deaf adder's ear; Speak thou for me, my sword; both deaf and dead

Shall hear the seven sharp words that thou shalt speak.

CHORUS.

O wilt thou slay her?

DAVID.

Nay, I slay her hate.

CHORUS.

How, how?

DAVID.

Cutting these bodies from the tree.

RIZPAH.

Jackals, wolves, foxes, kites and bearded vultures Have I with crying hands through summer vigil

Kept from these bodies; but now springs a beast,

A fouler and more carrion-loving monster, Waving death in his sword. Owomen, women, Share with me the shrill pleasure of my death, Fighting to save these dead.

DAVID.

Be silent, sword;

Thou hast too sharp an edge of speech;

sleep thou,

Imbedded in thy sheath. With softer words This box, opening its dumb mouth, will speak. Ye watching women I address; come hither; Look ye; see what is here, say what ye see.

CHORUS.

What, what? how can I tell?

DAVID.

Touch not these bones.

CHORUS.

O do I look on fire-burned bones?

DAVID.

The ashes
Dug from the tree at Ramoth-Gilead.

CHORUS.

Of Saul and Jonathan?

DAVID.

All but the head Hung with the armour in Astarte's temple.

RIZPAH.

What do I hear?

DAVID.

What thou canst see.

RIZPAH.

O God!

DAVID.

These are the dead bones of thy husband, Saul, And Jonathan, his son, who was my friend, Reduced by fire.

RIZPAH.

O woe is me, O woe!

CHORUS.

See, she bends over them with weeping hair.

DAVID.

One tear at least thou sparest from thy sons To fall on these poor bones; I too shed tears Over that silver dust. Tear has met tear; Our tears have touched, thy tear and mine; O Rizpah,

Have we not in this mingling of our tears Together made a covenant of salt?

CHORUS.

O mistress, O dear mother, give good heed.

RIZPAH.

Am I now in a dream, a slippery dream, Twixt sleep and waking?

DAVID.

Put thou forth thy hand.

CHORUS.

Ask thou of him; for me, I fear to ask.

RIZPAH.

What should I ask? I know not what to ask.

CHORUS.

Why he unyoked the power of these dead bones?

RIZPAH.

The hand was rash.

CHORUS

Or the intent was good.

DAVID.

Father and sons shall sleep within one tomb.

CHORUS.

I see a ray of hope.

RIZPAH.

In Gibcon?

DAVID

Better that tree, their growing sepulchre At Ramoth-Gilead.

RIZPAH.

Where then?

DAVID.

In Zelah.

RIZPAH.

The tomb of Kish?

DAVID.

Saul's father.

RIZPAH.

This thou swearest?

DAVID.

My oath shall be the stone that seals their tomb.

CHORUS.

Rejoice, Rizpah, rejoice; we too rejoice.

RIZPAH.

Was it for this thou camest?

DAVID.

Swift as rain.

RIZPAH.

Yet thou didst let them die?

DAVID.

At word of God.

RIZPAH.

Who sent the drought.

DAVID.

And the releasing rain.

RIZPAH.

If what thou sayest is in truth the truth, My steps shall go along with these dead men.

DAVID.

Then out, my sword, and speak; nay, sing a song

For Rizpah's ear, neither too harsh nor sweet.

King David cuts down the bodies from the tree.

SEMI-CHORUS I.

Is it an airy dream Or some enchantment I behold : A vapour from the cold Ox-horned, malignant moon,

Or phantasy that soon Will shrivel like a sunbow on a stream?

SEMI-CHORUS II.

I feel as though a wand
Thrice had waved before my eyes,
And this wizardry that dyes
The alien light of day
Would swiftly shrink away
And vanish at the waking of my hand.

CHORUS.

From Jesse's rod there sprang a stem, (Rejoice, rejoice, O Bethlehem,)
A stem, a sapling and an oak, (Rejoice with harp and dulcimer,)
Tossing in tempestuous smoke,
Scattering stars and thunder from his hair.
(Let us rejoice, rejoice with them
Who sing aloud for Bethlehem.)

Crowned with a star-set diadem, (Be glad, be glad, O Bethlehem,)
O see that stem of Jesse stand,
(Raise a glad shout and bend the knee,)
Lifting his rod across the land,
Shaking a flowery sceptre on the sea.
(Let us be glad, be glad with them
Who sing aloud for Bethlehem.)

6047 046A 03

PR Young, Andrew The adversary

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

